If your booking has been confirmed there will be a binding contract between you and the holiday trader that you booked with. If the arrangements are(then-than-this) changed and the changes are(significant- significantly- significance), you can either accept the change or cancel the holiday and ask(at-to- for)a refund. You may also be entitled to claim compensation for any loss you may have suffered as a result of cancelling the holiday, for example(disappoint – disappointment- disappointed)or inconvenience. If you accept the change either 'under protest'(neither-and- or) because you have little choice, you may still be able to claim compensation. If you do not accept the change you can cancel the holiday, but will only be entitled to compensation if the change means you would(be-is-been) worse off. If the change to your holiday arrangements is not significant, you will not be able to cancel the holiday, but you may be able to claim compensation because the holiday trader has (broken- broke –breaking) one of the terms of your contract. Some contract terms can be (unfair-fairly-fair) to the customer. Examples of this include contract terms written in such a way that you cannot understand them, or terms which take away your legal rights.
