1. Little boys dream big. By the time Dikembe Mutombo turned 9, he knew he wanted to be a doctor. He would work hard, study abroad and return to Congo to help his countrymen. Then, the son of a schoolmaster grew up and up and up to 2.2 meters. Mutombo naturally spent plenty of time on the basketball court as a youth. However, he arrived at Georgetown University on an academic scholarship and instructions from his father to return home with an education. He disobeyed. During Mutombo's second year at college, legendary coach John Thompson asked him to play basketball and launched the career of the big man described by National Basketball Association coaches and team mates as a determined player with an "excellent touch"
2. For all those qualities, Mutombo, 36, the star centre for the New Jersey Nets and four-time NBA Defensive Player of the year, now needs just six and a half seconds on court to earn the $450 his father used to make a year. And he is using his four year $68 million contract to do what his inner doctor would do : he is giving a hand to his countrymen who are too poor to supply their basic needs by themselves, he is helping to heal his war-torn homeland.
3. The aid Mutombo gives out comes in all different forms. To two nieces and two nephews, Mutombo offered a home and the opportunity to be educated in the USA. For Congo's national women's basketball team, he provided equipment and funding for their trip to the 1996 Atlanta Olympics. To Special Olympians, he has donated his time and energy for clinics and workshops. And in his hometown, Kinshasa, is building a $14.5 million hospital. Mutombo believes that God has given him this opportunity to do great things for his country and boost their living standards, especially in health care.
4. as one fundraiser for the hospital, Mutombo quoted a modern African proverb "when you take the elevator up to reach the top, please don't forget to send it back down, sothat someone else can take it to the top" he said: "this is my way of sending the elevator down"
