

When Mike, my husband, and I decided to take off for a year to travel the world with our three teenage sons, the decision was the easy part. Walking away from the life we currently knew was the difficult part. The number one question I am asked is about the boys' schooling.

FLVS played a major role in making our dream a reality. We began homeschooling the boys through FLVS in 2005 while Harrison was in middle school and when our twins were entering high school. Using FLVS as our main educational platform allowed all of them to work ahead. Morgan and Zach were able to finish high school in only three years and Harrison was able to work ahead by a year. Even while traveling, he decided to take a few extra online classes. It started out fine, as we were always able to find an Internet connection. However, we quickly discovered the Internet was not always reliable in other countries.

In fact, I remember a situation when Harrison was taking a big Spanish exam while we were in the jungle of Costa Rica. He was sitting outside, which is where he found the strongest Wi Fi signal. There were monkeys swinging above his head as he was taking the exam. A little over an hour into the exam, he hit the submit button and lost his Internet connection. He was not a happy camper, but he went with the flow and contacted his teacher who reset the exam. After several similar instances, we decided to hold off on taking any additional online classes due to unreliable Internet.

Mike always says that it was giving our three sons a hands-on, real world global education. While I agree, I believe we also learned so much more. We discovered how happy we can be without lots of stuff – and most importantly, we learned how to step away out of our comfort zones, because that is where life and the adventure truly begins.

2) Put the bracketed words in the right Form and / or Tense (3 marks) :

Some studies indicate that grouping can damage students' self-esteem by consigning them to lower-tier groups; others suggest that it 1-(produce) the opposite effect by ensuring that more advanced students do not make their 2-(little) advanced peers feel inadequate. Some studies conclude that grouping improves test scores in students of all levels, others that it helps high-3-(achieve) students while harming low-achieving ones, and still others say that it has little effect. Proponents of grouping argue that without it, teachers 4-(force) to teach to the middle, leaving out both struggling children and gifted learners. When interviewed, several teachers said they believed modern-day grouping 5-(be) not discriminatory because the groups were constantly in change. But they acknowledged the additional challenge of tailoring instruction to different groups, as they must produce multiple lesson plans and 6-(keep) closer track of students' progress. Some experts attribute it to No Child Left Behind, the 2001 law that strengthened accountability standards for schools.
